

Waitlists are depriving people of their rights to life, liberty & the pursuit of happiness.

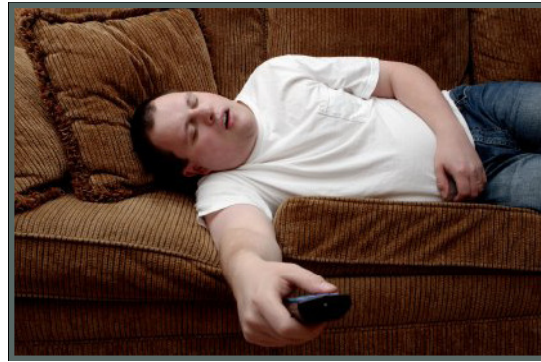

People with developmental disabilities are unable to obtain services to help them to work and cannot obtain housing because state and federal government have failed to fund the necessary services.

Waitlists for services for adults with developmental disabilities are a national disgrace. Some states have over 100,000 adults with extreme needs waiting for services. A few states have passed legislation to end the waitlists, but individuals in most states are fighting for services one person at a time.

NOEWAIT proposes national advocacy, awareness and coordination to solve this issue.

Did You Know?

Over 4 million Americans have developmental disabilities. After they leave school, often at age 21, they move into the adult services category—for job services, day programs, home living situations, respite care, etc. Adult services are funded with “home and community based waivers,” which are markedly underfunded in most states. A young adult may wait years after high school to get services, and a person moving from one state to another must start over on the waitlist!

State waitlists can be longer than 30 years!

Why is This a Problem?

- Individuals are deprived of their rights - they cannot live and work where they want. Even if they do receive services, those services are not portable from one state to the next.
- Individuals lose valuable skills learned in years of training in the schools and in vocational transition programs.
- Years are wasted waiting without productive and appropriate programs in place for individuals.
- Aging parents are exhausted, lack resources to properly care for their adult children, often take themselves out of the work force to be caregivers, and must fight for services for their children. In many cases around the nation, parents have passed away, leaving their children with nowhere to go.
- Society loses the benefit of contributions from the individuals and their parents.
